Teaching Philosophy

I approach the instruction of clinical social work, counseling, and psychology with two primary objectives. (1) to provide students with the tools to translate theory into direct practice. (2) to integrate the art and science of social work, counseling, and psychology into an experiential and embodied learning experience.

Teaching clinical practice, I believe, carries with it the responsibility to provide students with practical clinical tools and skills that they can take into their work. Clinical theories need to be tested and grounded in direct practice while practice needs to be guided by theory and research. Theory without practice is sterile; practice without theory is blind. My teaching approach is guided by the goal of educating dynamic scholar-practitioners who can also interpret clinical research, integrate neurobiology findings into their practice, and incorporate a social justice framework.

My philosophy is that clinical practice is best taught through experiential, relational, and reflective teaching methods. The social work, counseling, and psychology professions' emphasis on experiential learning is evident in its use of field education (internships/practicums) while the relational nature of learning is highlighted in the profession's core values and through the instructor/supervisor relationships. Implementing teaching structures where students apply concepts to their own experience enhances learning through the reflective process. Content is more likely to be integrated through a multi-sensory experience than simply through a cognitive exercise. As humans, we are neurobiologically wired to learn through relationships and in action. As an instructor, I aim to provide an embodied learning experience where students are engaged in personal reflection and experience course content in action. Rather than just talk about ideas and concepts, I facilitate teaching structures where students can have a direct encounter with the material.

My background as a practitioner and trainer of trauma therapy, experiential therapy, sociometry, psychodrama, and group therapy highly inform my approach as an educator. The mutual aid of one student teaching another become increasingly accessible through the application of sociometric processes and what Louis Cozolino calls an "attachment-based classroom". With proper warm-up, psychodramatic, sociodramatic, and other role-play techniques bring the course content to life. As an instructor, I work actively to balance educational content with the process of educating while maintaining appropriate boundaries in the classroom. Students are the future of the profession. I hope to help cultivate a generation of scholar-practitioners equipped with the personal values of self-awareness and integrity along with the professional skills necessary to work competently as clinicians and leaders.
